This is indeed sad but the fact remains that fansubbers are not exactly taking money that should be going to studios.

What I am getting is that fansubbing is like game modding where some people prefer to get modded games. And the game modder benefits from that but this doesn't mean that game modding is directly hurting game industry.

The fact that someone chooses to play a modded game doesn't mean the game modder "stealing" from the game developers.

I must respectfully disagree with your statement.

By voluntarily modding a game, you are:

1. Downloading a copy of the game
2. Modding the game
3. Redistributing the game as a modded product

This very definition of piracy is "the unauthorized use or reproduction of another's work". With this in mind, of course game modders are "stealing" from developers. I am not denying that many people may prefer a modded version of a game, but developers are very open about how much harm piracy and modding does to them.

azulakina said:

Fansubbing is "not" a low-cost activity. For one you need to learn enough Japanese to watch raw anime then subtitles are not just translations, you have to express emotions etc - basically, a lot of stuff. At the same time, your English needs to be up to the task(I doubt they're so many Japanese folks who speak "cool" English as I do)

The bottom line is, it's not exactly a low cost activity.

I think you have missed the point.

Of course it takes a lot of time and effort to learn Japanese. However, translators are almost always native Japanese speakers, falsifying your argument. The biggest cost of fansubbing anime is paying the translators, subtitle writers, and proof-readers. Heck, even professional video-editing software costs a good amount these days (although some are available for free but do not offer the versatility as Premiere or Cyberstudio etc).

Okay, I will not directly comment on fansubs as I don't know enough about them.

I can say this though, if the game publishers do not allow for modding, the only legal way to mod is to distribute your patch without the game, which I doubt could ever work since I don't think a mod could be so popular.

If I was to apply this to anime, it would mean that fansubs just distribute the subtitle files.

Also, try inserting message number when you quote, makes your post look a lot better. Or, maybe not.

But that doesn't happen at all. No one wants to get a subtitle file because they would need to download the anime along with it, which would be a lot of hassle and take up a lot of storage. The only logical way to do this is for fansubbers to upload their anime onto streaming websites, which is already happening.

Okay, which means that fansubs/fansubbers consciously engage in illegal activity.

To hell with fansubs, then.

So, well, it could be assumed that anime from bootlegging sites is subbed by fansubbers?

There wasn't money to lose to fansubs because the animes with fansubs are ones only officially released in Japan. Beats me as to why CR, Funi, etc. refuse to get more kids shows which angers me.

Okay.

Now that this is update 9/28 - looks like we'll be waiting for API to be back into a functional state for quite some time.

I mean, when do we get to update 28 if we're at update 9 right now?

Nope, more like a genuine question - if we're having update 9/28 which means we have 19 more updates before MAL is fully back up.

The only item that's not fully back is API - I mean, I do not know whether MAL had a functional API before(as I have never used it) but it looks like what we'll be waiting for the next 19 updates.

I knew it. This place is becoming worse by the day. Removal of a feature is never a good thing. And using "to support the industry" as an excuse is a really scummy thing to do.

The only valid excuse is that the feature was a troll magnet, but then so are the reviews - you should take those away too then.

...Now excuse me while I go on a piracy binge to make up for my annoyance.

I am not a hardcore anime fan but I do routinely watch anime for fun. I'm mostly just not used to watching anything.

MAL, a community created by its users, that cares more about its corporate sponsorship dollars.

I'm really sad to see the fansub section gone. That was over a decade of user-accumulated information, expunged for senseless reasons. At the very least, make a dump of the info available for download, so another more qualified service can carry the torch seeing how MAL is unwilling to do so. That's the final nail in the coffin for me. Goodbye.

Hopefully it will eventually, I think we all know that MAL is slow on these kinds of things.

I was really annoyed when MAL went down, too, because the day before the crash I had literally bought a new S9 to replace my old iPhone 6—and I was hoping that I would be able to download and try out the new MAL app.... NOPE!

Unfortunate. The discussion from the company is off-point. Wanting continuing development of application, as well.

That's not exactly the point. The main idea is just to make a point to support the anime industry not to make a silly resolution to stay away from bootleg and torrent sites.

Also, for those who care, my English is not exactly broken, it's more or less a way of being cool.

What is so bad about fansubs?

So, if a show is licensed and people watch it fansubbed instead of paying to watch it with official subs or a dub, the company won't get any money, nor will the original creators or animators.

However, I totally think fansubs should be fine for shows that are unlicensed or have shady official subs. Sadly, the law tends to have general rules, not specific ones.

What about a case where I even have a CR or Hulu or other subscription that allows me to watch certain shows legitimately but choose to go the bootleg way?

Fansubs are just there, they'll probably remain there, we're not here to enforce copyright laws, so well, to some extent - to hell with the whole issue shrug

Great idea. In theory. Here is the problem though.

We live in a world where people literally can make 100% original content online, but if even a tiny 2 second long fragment contains even an excerpt of something, a company will find it and issue a DMCA and not it removed. It is almost impossible now to submit fake DMCA's and not them removed. Again I refer back to the situation on youtube as a perfect example of how absolutely bad things have become.

I am all for supporting fansubs but one has to be realistic and this site has been very high profile the past few years, that is the reason it was targeted that is the reason for all of this. If you want the site to stay around then you have to make some choices.

Only way to truly fight the censor is decentralized services, be them social medias, streaming/torrent services (already decentralized), or various fan based websites for different things such as this. We have a long long way to go to achieve fully decentralized software with regard to how websites and web services are hosted, barring that the next best thing is caution, and high profile websites often have to bend in order to not break.
